The eZine for Open-minded Reiki people

Why don't I feel so much when I self-treat? What's going on when self-treatments seem to feel so mild??

Something that a few Reiki people have mentioned to me is that they never seem to feel too much happening when they are self-treating, certainly not compared to the stronger sensations that they might experience when treating other people. They might feel something happening in their hands when they use a hands-on self-treatment method, but it's all a bit gentle and unremarkable. So what is going on here? Are Reiki self-treatments weak and ineffective, a thin and weedy version of the powerhouse of treating someone else, or is there something else happening here?

Here's my take on this...

You self-treat a lot

So, you go on a Reiki course and what do you do? You self-treat. Maybe you "do your 21 days" (though if you take my advice about self-treating, you'll just self-treat endlessly forever!) so you're working with the energy a lot. You've been attuned or empowered and you may experience your "Reiki cold" or some sort of a healing crisis as a result of that, and when you treat other people, you'll also receive a benefit from the energy that you're channelling, or the 'healing space' that you are creating, as you merge with the energy and the recipient and find that empty, mindful space.

If you tune into my weekly distant Reiju empowerment you'll also experience a repeated putting-you-back-to-factory-settings, taking you back to that simpler, still state, which you were in before life messed you up!

So you're receiving the benefits of the energy a lot, in different ways, so when you self-treat regularly, a lot of the work has already been done, and is being done as you go along, with little adjustments here and there, little tweaks, small releases of things. That doesn't sound like it's going to give you a big bells-and-whistles experience, does it?

That's not to say that Reiki can't reach deep down, working on deep-seated stuff, which may at some stage come to the surface and give you a surprising clear-out further down the line, but from day to day, how much intense energy work really needs to be done? It doesn't, so your self-treatments feel suitably mild. That's all they need to be. We should remember that Reiki will give you what you need on that occasion, and since the last time you self-treated, which may have been only a day or so ago, you may not need very much!
